A fifth person has died after a shooting at a Los Angeles newsroom, NBC has confirmed. "A fifth person was shot in the incident. There is a significant number of police activity around the building," police said in a statement. The death brings the total number of fatalities from the shooting to six. It also raised questions about the number of witnesses who said they saw two armed people walk into the newsroom of the TV station KTLA on Thursday evening. ADVERTISEMENT The outlet described the gunman as "a man wearing a red shirt." "I just saw two men in red shirts walk in. One was wearing a red hat, maybe a bandana on his face. He had what looked like a rifle in a sling over his shoulder," witness and news reporter Marielena Magana told NBC Los Angeles. "One was a little more stoic, more involved, ready to shoot, while the other one was the one I could tell was more of the shooter. It looks like he's the one who actually fired the shots." Magana did not provide any other details about the description of the shooters, but said that she saw the pair when they first entered. "I saw them as they walked in, and then I saw two men with guns," she added. "They looked like they were military looking. They walked in and I turned around, and I saw one had a gun and he looked like he was ready to shoot." The LAPD said that the shooting occurred around 5:15 p.m. local time. Police said that the shooters fled on foot after opening fire. Q: How to verify multiple Elements matching using XPath I want to verify that multiple elements on a page are of the same type, using XPath. For example, I've got a validator that will verify both this textarea and this checkbox. It's currently doing the check for one or the other. I know it's possible to add a regex pattern to a XPath so I can verify both. But my question is - is there another way to specify that multiple elements have to be of the same
