Yes, there are, and she DOES have the tools, but whether you have the skills or not, doesn't matter. She does not have the tools to treat your mental health condition. For real. But with them (the mental health "tools"), the problem is pretty much the same. You can't help the situation. It's your own fault or it's not Q. multithread.sleep and checking whether a process is alive I would like to write a simple class that would check if a process is alive, similar to Java's ProcessLivenessListener I have a problem to figure out how to implement it. If I have this example myProcess.start(); threadA.sleep(2); myProcess.isAlive();// not working myProcess.isAlive();// it worked I need to process A1 and wait for process B to end, then return all the results. I have a brute force method with a counter and a lot of if to check if I have the correct results, but I'm looking for something more efficient. A: This can be achieved using the java.util.concurrent API. If you declare a runnable task you can call myProcess.waitFor(); myProcess.waitFor(long);
