Saunders has a wonderful job. He spends about half his time in the office writing. His day is filled with meetings and phone calls, but he's got lots of time to roam through the halls and corridors of The New Yorker, and he goes through his days noticing and recording the denizens of the magazine's jungle. Saunders isn't just writing stuff about the denizens of the office; he's writing about them in prose that's impeccably smart, insightful, poignant and funny. He's got a knack for capturing the daily happenings, the metamorphoses and misadventures of the people who work at the New Yorker. His new book, Collections, focuses on the magazine's staff of writers and artists and shows them at their best. And he shows them at their worst, too. What follows is a 40-minute audio interview with Saunders. He talks about his writing process, his need to root himself in the physical surroundings of The New Yorker, and how he went about capturing all these insightful things about the staff in person and in print. It's a conversational interview, and Saunders is in a great mood. The interview is listed as a podcast on the right side of the page. If you click on the audio player, you can play it on your computer or on your iPhone. (Audio is embedded below.) You can also download the audio file to your computer or iPhone and listen to it

In this study, we examined the impact of attachment insecurity on the relationship between gender and negative symptoms. Using structural equation modeling, we examined the direct and indirect effects of attachment and gender on negative symptoms in 206 patients with schizophrenia. The results indicated a direct association between insecure attachment style and more negative symptoms in men than women. However, this effect was not found when negative symptoms were mediated by a more general index of emotional distress. Our findings support the notion that gender-related differences in social and emotional functioning may underlie
