On second thoughts about his seat. “Unfortunately, I wish that [the ouster] had been earlier, but it’s good to be here now,” Kumar told me by phone from Washington, D.C., where he is leading the India desk for the Wall Street Journal. AD Kumar’s story, as told to me by several Indian Americans and others who worked with him, also sounds like a plot summary for a quality Bollywood film. The 30-year-old began his work life in the video-games business, where he was a software engineer. From there he went to Apple, where he became a software developer and later a senior engineer. Then he moved to the Journal, where he became, as he put it, “the software engineer” — still a software engineer and a senior engineer, but a senior software engineer. AD At the Journal, Kumar oversaw about 40 software engineers and worked on a team that built the iPad app, the Journal app, and many other apps for the Journal, the Journal’s TV network and several other sites. In particular, he wrote software that enabled the iPad app to “pause,” or freeze, any breaking news story and get a photo or video of the event onto the Journal’s site. It was all made possible because of what Johnson and Kumar figured out how to do together. The two men are very different. 82138339de
