This invention relates to connectors for the armored transmission of light fibers and the like. A standard connector for use in an armored cable which is used for light transmission is an "L" type connector which includes a channel comprising an interior cavity which is open at both ends. For use with fiber optic cables, a ferrule is mounted in the end of the channel. The end of the optical fiber is inserted into the ferrule and the ferrule is placed in the channel and locked into position in the channel by a set screw. The end of the optical fiber protrudes from the opposite end of the ferrule where it can be coupled to a similar connector containing another fiber optic cable. The construction of the standard "L" type connectors has led to the development of a number of different connectors having the same general shape, although which differ from the standard "L" connector in the relative orientation of their components, the manner of retaining the fiber in the ferrule, and/or the manner of locking the ferrule into the channel. In particular, fiber connectors which have recently become more popular include a construction in which a generally cylindrical ferrule is disposed in a generally axially extending channel in a housing. At least one end of the ferrule is open with the cylindrical surface thereof facing toward the end of the housing and the hollow interior thereof containing a resilient sealing member. A probe is inserted into the opening so as to
