This week brought the release of Last of Us Part II, a heartfelt and emotional film that left audiences in tears. As it turns out, creating a scene with that kind of emotional impact takes a lot of preparation. Playing with emotion is the goal in the Uncharted film series, with each of the first three films being a study in grit, heart and purpose. The fourth film, Uncharted 4: A Thief's End, was a pivotal step for the franchise, as it was the first time

Nathan Drake had come to the attention of the Uncharted team. This news comes from Ollie Marcato, who is now the franchise's lead animator, a position he took on when he was hired at Naughty Dog prior to the first game's development. In an interview with Polygon, Marcato explained the process behind designing Drake's teary-eyed final moments in the series' finale. The moment was a direct reference to Uncharted 4's most infamous scene. Nathan Drake sits on a ship's deck, staring out at the ocean. With the All Points Bulletin fired up, Nathan is rewarded with confirmation that Ellie died saving him. The moment in question came from an emotional tribute scene where Ellie was saying goodbye to Drake, played out in a flashback. It was an emotional moment, which took a long time to put together because it was a very emotional moment. So, I was there for the whole thing from start to finish. While the final cut was a very short sequence, Marcato explained what it took to make that moment work. Not a lot. It was something that was kind of important, because I think that's an essential moment, a big scene in the game. It took a lot of work on the animation side. I was designing some of the layout, so that we could preserve the emotion of the scene, the way we had decided to play it out
