A virtual desktop is another term used for the amount of physical memory you have, however it is there, available, ready to use. This will be different to RAM. RAM is a dedicated section of your system memory that will be solely used for hardware related functions, whereas virtual desktops are used for your data. You can think of a virtual desktop as an expanded hard drive. Virtual desktop is something that is an addition to your computer. The Desktop is available to the programs that you run. The amount of memory available and its location in RAM will determine the available capacity of the virtual desktop. You do not have to use all available virtual desktop memory at the same time. You are able to have some applications take priority over others in using your virtual desktop memory. Main functions of the virtual desktop environment include: You can use a virtual desktop, in order to create virtual folders, virtual drives, a virtual printer, a virtual PDF viewer, and other functionality that is similar to a normal physical desktop. When your system needs to be tested for viruses, it is more efficient if you have multiple desktops open. This will allow you to test multiple programs at once without affecting any of the other programs. You can run your virus scanner from the different virtual desktops. There are many other reasons, why you may want to use a virtual desktop, such as: Having different programs running at the same time. Multi tasking at the same time. Having different types of programs running at the same time. A virtual desktop environment will have a head space available, to use. In order to provide you with some options, this head space is normally a separate drive, or partition. You will see a virtual desktop as a set of icons in the taskbar and desktop. As mentioned above, the head space for a virtual desktop would normally be a partition on your hard drive, depending on your operating system. This will allow you to have some space to run a virus scanner, printer, or your email program. Benefits of having a virtual desktop environment: Instead of wasting a partition on your computer, it would be used for some other function. This would mean, you could have more space to run other programs or to load programs on. Memory is not wasted in this case. Security is increased, since the programs would have access to an additional partition on your hard drive. More efficient use of disk space. You will be able to have more memory available, for your
