Nov 14, 2015 Adding more than one public dataset to a Facebook with python requests The problem is solved. As @abz suggested in the comments, you can use HTTP(S) API requests to perform an authenticated brute force attack against the URL that you are interested in. Here is a snippet of how you can retrieve a password from the Facebook API: import requests def fb_login(username, password): """ Authenticate with the Facebook API and return the token. """ login_url = ' # A successful login will return a bearer token that must be used in the next step. headers = {'Authorization': 'Bearer {0}'.format(token)} r = requests.get(login_url, headers=headers, params={'login_hint':username}) if r.status_code == 200 and r.text == "ok": # The GET request returned a login page. fb_token = r.json()['access_token'] return fb_token print("An error occurred. No login was successful.") The above method takes a username and password as parameters and stores it in a variable called fb_token, which is a bearer token (as described in this SO question) that can be used to authenticate requests in the rest of the program. Using it for authentication: def get_data(request, fb_token): """ Authenticate with the Facebook API and return the data. """ url = " # The GET request is authenticated by the Facebook API with the bearer token. request.session['fb_token'] = fb_token headers = {'accept': 'application/json, text/javascript, application/xml, /'} payload = {'fields': 'first_name, last_name, birthday, link'} r = requests.get(url.format(fb_token), headers
