Isolation and characterization of rhodopsin cDNA clones from the fish eyes of the paradise fish (Macropodus notatus). A major portion of the retina of the paradise fish, Macropodus notatus, contains photoreceptor cells that can be classified into two distinct types. The first type contains rod cells that express rod opsin mRNA. It also contains two distinct classes of cone cells, L and M. The L cells express the cDNA of the blue-sensitive opsin in their outer segment, while the M cells express the cDNA of the red-sensitive opsin. All three types of photoreceptor cells are phagocytosed by histologically similar pigment epithelial cells. In an effort to identify the opsins expressed by the M cells and the L cells, full-length cDNA clones encoding opsin molecules were isolated. Two clones were found to have the region coding for the photoreceptor domain of a guanine nucleotide binding protein and the other four clones contained the region coding for the opsin. The clones were designated aR, aL-I, bR, and cR, respectively, in accordance with the five photoreceptor types found in M. notatus retina. It was shown by Northern analysis that mRNA transcripts are present in all types, and that aL-I is expressed at high levels in the rod cells and aR in the cone cells.Q: How to insert values into a matrix in Mat
