Mammalian motor neuron toxicity results from activation of a large fraction of cytosolic Ca2+ stores. The physiological function of the endoplasmic reticulum is to store Ca2+ ions in a relatively slow manner. However, in conditions of cell stress such as high [Ca2+], the release of Ca2+ ions from the reticulum may promote the observed increase in cytosolic Ca2+ concentration to toxic levels. Here, we show that neurons from the hypoglossal nucleus (XI) of mice that have died in response to activation of mechanosensory neurons express up to 80% of the total Ca2+ content of the cytosol in their remaining mammalian motor neurons. We report that motor neurons die when exposed to a physiological concentration of Ca2+, whereas other neurons, including those that die in response to channel or other pathophysiological stimuli, die when the cytosolic Ca2+ concentration is raised to higher levels. This form of cell death, which is specific to the reticulum, is due to Ca2+-dependent activation of Ca2+-dependent proteases in mammalian motor neurons.STRATEGIC APPROACH Performant Executive Team Caring for the Long-Term Success of Team Foundation Server 2010 We developed and architected a long-term strategy for maximizing and extending the life of Team Foundation Server 2010.
