The program, known as the Online Forensic Analytical Tool (OFAT) already recruits several women into its ranks, but they are just a small part of a larger effort to find a new class of soldiers who can not only fight the cyber battle from their personal computers, but also become experts on a new frontier of warfare. The OFAT program is headed by Col. John Riggs, an Army program manager in the Pentagon's Warfighting Integration Center. He says the program is focused on the specialized skills needed to break into almost any device and get the best possible information from it. "It's a very different skill set," Riggs told Defense News. "And I think that in a way, we know what we have as a challenge is a revolution of skills and not just in the cognitive area, but also in the behavioral area." The OFAT program is examining the computer skills and knowledge needed to analyze the vast amount of information contained on modern computing devices. "We need to do more than just develop people who can hit a computer key," Riggs said. "We have 1cb139a0ed
