Also of note, the secondary chromosome is initially associated with the primary chromosome, but it dissociates due to the chromatid splitting and it is not reassociated with the primary chromosome. Later, intermingled secondary and primary chromosomes are observed at the metaphase and anaphase stages. Conclusion ===== We confirmed the existence of the so-called secondary chromosome in *C. brenneri and *A. diandrous as a result of chromatid splitting. During this process, the secondary chromosome is mostly associated with the primary chromosome, but it is not tightly associated with the primary chromosome and is capable of dissociation. We suppose that the secondary chromosome functions as a regulation device for chromatid splitting. A host of factors may contribute to heterochromatin formation at the telomere ends, including heterochromatic centromeres of the primary and secondary chromosomes and the telomere itself ([@B9]). Of these, the centromere is likely the most important. Indeed, the split chromosome was observed to acquire a pericentric heterochromatin block which may also contribute to the stable association between the primary and secondary chromosome. Further studies on the stable association of the secondary chromosome with the primary chromosome should focus on establishing the relationship between centromeres and the secondary chromosome. Since centromeres are necessary for chromosome segregation and cell division, the secondary chromosomes that are formed by chromatid splitting should represent a novel chromosomal structure. The fission yeast *S. pombe may be a good model for studying the splitting of the chromatid in this species. Bifluid chromosomes have been previously reported in several species. For example, in dogs and chimpanzees, two or
