Now I have a new module (say M) which imports the modules from the repository. M depends on pymodule_A and pymodule_B. I can extract pymodule_A and pymodule_B to a new repository and develop M there. Now how to get to the state where M depends on pymodule_A and pymodule_B from the current git repository? For M to depend on pymodule_A and pymodule_B I have to extract pymodule_A and pymodule_B to a new repository and develop M there, but that is a lot of work, we will be deploying the extracted modules on different computers, and I would like to get to the state where M depends on pymodule_A and pymodule_B from the current git repository. A: You don't need to extract the whole directory. Just extract the files you want to be "installed" on the other computer, and then make the git repository mount that folder as a submodule in M, just like you would to any other git submodule. Then do a git commit and git push. Indians pitcher Carlos Carrasco has been suspended 50 games without pay for testing positive for a banned substance.
