Pulmonary thromboembolism remains a potentially fatal disease with high prevalence. Rapid and accurate diagnosis and treatment is the key to improve outcome. We review the available strategies for diagnosis and the various studies to assess their accuracy and cost-effectiveness in the clinical setting. Despite the lack of a suitable and widely available test (like that for deep vein thrombosis), clinical presentation and transthoracic echocardiography should be used in conjunction with D-dimer measurement in all patients with suspected pulmonary thromboembolism. However, sensitivity and specificity of echocardiography for detection of emboli are variable and should be used in the context of clinical suspicion and a high pretest probability of thromboembolism (e.g., young, unprovoked patients). The greatest benefit is usually achieved by combining clinical and imaging data. Computed tomography with pulmonary angiography should be used to complement the diagnosis when the clinical scenario is uncertain and to exclude other conditions.
