The coordination of DNA and chromosome mechanics with chromosome segregation is mediated by the mitotic checkpoint complex (MCC). This complex, consisting of checkpoint proteins Bub1, Bub3, BubR1, Mad1, and Mad2 in vertebrates, serves to safeguard the fidelity of chromosome segregation. We found that the antifolate trimethoprim (TMP) inhibits the MCC by inhibiting the binding of Bub3 with BUBR1 in metaphase and by blocking mitotic arrest associated with prolonged mitosis in the presence of spindle poisons. In vitro assays for the assembly of MCC and POLD3-induced DNA synthesis demonstrated that TMP inhibits the binding of Bub3 with BUBR1 by binding directly to Bub3 at a site distinct from Bub1 and BubR1 binding sites. Experiments with GTP analogues revealed that the inhibition of binding between Bub3 and BUBR1 by TMP is due to the impairment of GTP-dependent conformational changes of Bub3, but not of Bub1 and BubR1, required for the binding with BUBR1. GTP-dependent conformational changes of Bub3 are essential for its binding with Mad2, which is a component of the MCC. Our findings indicate that TMP specifically binds to Bub3, inhibiting the assembly of the MCC, thereby increasing the rate of chromosome segregation without affecting DNA replication.
