The more money you spend on the image-editing software, the more features and steps you have access to. So if you're willing to pay for Photoshop—which should be your most-expensive editing tool—check out some training videos for a quick overview on how to use the software in ways that will put more time into your day. When it comes to web use, Photoshop works well for creating logos and other images for the web. Using the information in these pages and in the training manuals, you can produce images that stand out, be memorable, and tell your story. Using Photoshop Photoshop includes a WYSIWYG (What You See Is What You Get) editing program that lets you take and manipulate your images into whatever form you envision. You have several layers of image editing tools with various modes, including:

- Creating a new image: This lets you produce a new document or an image in any size and any format that you desire. (Remember that you can use this method to create, resize, and rearrange any type of image.)
- Creating an image copy: This technique lets you copy layers from a source image into a new document. (The layers have the original image set as their source, plus the new document is set as their destination.)
- Moving, rotating, and resizing images: These features let you move, resize, and rotate images. You can use the Transform options to quickly fix flaws in an image.
- Using path tools: These tools let you draw shapes and lines and place them onto the background or other layer.
- Using adjustment layers: These adjustment layers work like a filter in any image editing program. You use them to adjust colors, contrast, and brightness/shadow and to let you paint on images. Figure 13-1 shows an example of what a new image can look like. Photoshop uses a layer-based editing system that enables raster image creation and altering with multiple overlays that support transparency. Photoshop's Layer panel (see Figure 13-2) lets you do all the editing you need, with each layer showing a different layer. Each layer includes tools to adjust the foreground or background color, colorize the image, use various filters, and so on. Using a layered approach, you can add or subtract layers to change an image, add text to it, or simply paint color over the original image in a type of moving-brush-like effect. (

[Neurological subtypes of multiple sclerosis: classification and treatment]. Neurological subtypes of multiple sclerosis (MS) are proposed by criteria mainly based on clinical and magnetic resonance imaging data. These subtypes are defined according to the anatomical location (lacunar or cortical, as well as periventricular and infratentorial) and the degree of involvement of the anatomical and functional pathways belonging to the central nervous system. This classification based on a simple model that combines a clinical perspective and a neuroimaging approach is particularly useful for therapeutic management. No correlation between clinical subtypes of MS and magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) has been clearly demonstrated. However, some MRI findings seem to help in diagnostic stratification. For example, an active phase of the disease is characterized by the presence of gadolinium-enhanced lesions in two consecutive MRI examinations, whereas a later phase is characterized by the appearance of new T2-hyperintense lesions and new or enlarging gadolinium-enhanced lesions. Cortical involvement is found in 75 to 90% of the patients with acute cortical forms of MS, whereas 60 to 70% of patients with progressive forms of MS develop cortical lesions. Post-mortem studies performed on MS patients have demonstrated the involvement of both grey and white matter in MS, with cortical lesions being particularly frequent in patients with a clinically active disease. ATM* (trigger factor). We also detected the H(+)-ATPase subunits (atpE and atpF) in the T. leycettana transcriptome and validated their expression level (S4 Table{ref-type="supplementary-material"}). Mg²⁺ depletion causes a dramatic increase in the concentration of secreted amino acid \[@pone.0166234.ref018]. The transcriptome of T. leycettana included genes encoding putative α/β hydrolases of glycosyl hydrolase family 18, which can degrade cell wall-related polysaccharides such as glycogen, xyloglucan and pectin. The transcript levels of the α/β hydrolases increased by 50-fold to 180-fold and 70-fold to 450-fold in response to Mg²⁺ depletion for 24 h and 48 h, respectively ([Table 3](#pone.0166234.t
