Wine from Australia? US exports of wine to the EU in 2011 amounted to 1.8 million hL, 1.6 million of which ended up in the EU. EU imports amounted to 2.4 million hL, 1.8 million of which ended up in the US. Dutch and Belgian data are also cited, with smaller volumes, and these may be partially accounted for in the figure as imports from France, Germany, Italy and UK would generally be a lower volume than exports. With such a small volume of Australian wine imports into the EU, you would need to look at the wider wine distribution to see if any significant portion of the total Australian wine does actually get to other countries. The above document shows that in 2011 a total of 1.8 million hL of Australian wine was exported to the EU, with 1.6 million of these exports ending up in the EU. As such, it is hard to see how any proportion of the Australian wine in the EU was 'imported' by the US. Another factor to consider is that the Australian data only includes wine volumes, ignoring trade in bottled wine grapes. For most countries, wine grapes are also a major export. Therefore there may well be exports of Australian wine grapes to the EU, and the EU may be buying Australian wine, that are not reflected in the figures above. Have you seen other data indicating that the US has been importing Australian wine into the US? Goodness, it's true that the kind of data you're looking for is in the Wine Australia research report. Hence the first half of this message above. The second half of the message is about Australian wine grape imports into the EU. The wines may be Australian, but they are usually French or Italian.

When a conventional firearm such as a revolver, semi-automatic or automatic rifle, or a combination thereof is empty, typically, the hammer is manually pulled back to the cocked position, and a cartridge is manually or automatically placed in the breech. When the user is ready to fire, the user typically releases the hammer and strikes the firearm on a target. The hammer is typically kept in the cocked position by the user's hand during the entire firing cycle. However, hitting the firearm on a target can release the hammer from the cocked position. If the firearm has not been properly reloaded after the previous firing, the firearm must be pulled apart to remove
