Computer Tomographic Determination of Laminectomy Levels With the Screw-Plate Lateral Interbody Fusion Device. Lateral lumbar interbody fusion (LLIF) using a screw-plate device appears to be an effective treatment method for degenerative disk disease. However, the actual degree of lumbar facet resection is somewhat controversial. We therefore conducted a retrospective cohort study to evaluate the lumbar facet resection with the screw-plate LLIF device as measured by computed tomography (CT). This study included 19 patients who underwent LLIF using a screw-plate device at our institution. We evaluated the changes in the facet joint angle before and after LLIF using the screw-plate LLIF device. The average preoperative facet joint angle was -6.3° , and the average angle after screw insertion was -10.1° . The postoperative facet joint angle had a mean of 7.6° . Facet joints were resected partially in six patients and completely in 13. The postoperative facet joint angle in patients with partial facet resection was 8.3° , and the angle in those with complete resection was 9.2° . The postoperative facet joint angle was significantly larger in patients with partial resection than in those with complete resection ($p = 0.006$). The screw-plate LLIF with partial facet resection can be
