Governor Andrew Cuomo said "it's fine" that the man accused of a mass rape and murder spree of more than a dozen women in New York will face a death penalty if convicted. "I'm a Capital Punishment person. I think it works," he said. "I mean if you're guilty, you know, my approach in life has always been guilty until proven innocent." NYPD arrested the suspect Thursday and charged him with raping and murdering at least 11 women in Suffolk County, New York. Authorities said that between 1998 and 2012, the suspect raped and beat the women as they walked home or were jogging along a popular bike path by the Hudson River in Central Islip. He managed to murder three of them in 2012 alone — by which time he was known to the police as a serial killer. Four days later, a fourth woman was discovered near her home. One woman, Nancy Montgomery, said she was studying for an exam the day after the attack on her and her boyfriend, when she saw a man — later identified as the suspect — who looked like a college student j 0cc13bf012
