The audience demand for higher-resolution digital cinema projections has been met with several different output options. First, there was the 4K Ultra High Definition format, a resolution more than twice as high as standard HD video. Then there was the CinemaScope format that runs digitally compressed cinema-sized video at 1.66 times the standard HD resolution. However, the next generation of high-definition video may come in the form of the "single lens system," or SLS, video format. A survey of about 1,000 U.S. theater owners by Digital Cinema Report (DCR) found that two-thirds of respondents saw the SLS format as the most important high-definition display technology, next to 4K and CinemaScope. The survey also found that 38 percent of respondents viewed a 4K display as the first choice in a high-end format. That would put 4K displays only slightly ahead of the 6K progressive scan format, a format that is also being showcased in a number of theaters now. So what's next? DCR's founder, Peter Fertig, says the next generation of high-definition video may look like the SLS format.
