A Call for Focused Intervention to Prevent Kidney Disease in Adolescents. Kidney disease is a major cause of morbidity and mortality in adolescence, but rates in this age group are increasing. Serum glucose, BMI, and sex are risk factors for both the development of microalbuminuria and the decline of kidney function in adolescents. Serum cholesterol is inversely related to renal function and albuminuria in adolescents. Low muscle mass, low physical activity, and high-fat food intake lead to low physical activity and obesity in adolescents, which are associated with metabolic, vascular, and structural changes in the kidney. Adolescents with type 2 diabetes are at high risk for renal disease and have a high prevalence of undiagnosed hypertension. Serum low-density lipoprotein-cholesterol is also associated with an increased risk of albuminuria and renal disease in adolescents. Kidney disease in adolescents is increasingly common, and comprehensive assessment should be performed in all adolescents with increased risk factors. In the context of preventive medicine, increased attention to diet, physical activity, and medication should be targeted toward adolescents. Auf der Bühne für Ihre Sache.
