Effects of adenosine and isoproterenol on contractions of guinea-pig taenia coli. The effects of adenosine on adenosine-induced contractions of the isolated guinea-pig taenia coli was examined. Adenosine had a biphasic effect on the tension of the taenia coli strips, increasing the tension at 5×10^{-5} M and then decreasing the tension at 5×10^{-4} M, but lower concentrations had no effect. At a concentration of 5×10^{-5} M, adenosine also potentiated the inhibitory effect of acetylcholine, while a lower concentration of adenosine (5×10^{-6} M) potentiated the inhibitory effect of isoproterenol. These results suggest that adenosine is a potent endogenous modulator of neurotransmission in the smooth muscle of guinea-pig taenia coli.
