Traditionally, when performing a surgical procedure, a surgeon makes an incision in a patient's flesh to provide access to the surgical site. This is usually followed by spreading or retracting surrounding tissue, or other organs if performing a laparoscopic or endoscopic procedure, in order to gain access to the surgical site. Once the surgery is complete, the surgeon must close the incision in the skin and tissue surrounding the incision. Sutures are the most commonly used type of material for closing incisions and other wounds. Sutures can be fastened to tissue with a needle and, generally, a suture needle is required for this application. However, some procedures, for example a laparoscopic or endoscopic procedure, may not include a needle due to the intrusion of a surgical instrument, for example, a trocar, into the body cavity. An instrument such as forceps, scissors, a punch, or other surgical instrument can be used to grasp tissue and make a hole without using a needle. However, in these procedures, the instrument alone is not sufficient to fasten a suture to the tissue. Instead, a suture-fastening device, such as a suture anchor, is utilized, which secures a suture to the tissue by means of an anchor member that extends from the device. The anchor member is often inserted into a hole made in the tissue by the instrument, for example a trocar. Sutures have a variety of configurations, including for example, a suture loop, a knot, or a single strand of monofilament or multifilament material threaded through a needle. Examples of suture anchors are described in U.S. Pat. No. 6,224,602, the entire contents of which are incorporated herein by reference. One type of suture anchor used in suturing a hole in tissue is described in U.S. Pat. No. 6,224,602, to Raab et al., which is owned by DePuy Orthopaedics Inc. The anchor described in Raab et al. comprises a generally flat helical member connected to a pusher portion that can be inserted into tissue, and frictionally deforms the helical member against the tissue. The pusher portion is an elongated member that can be retracted to allow the helical member to be inserted and then be pushed into the tissue in an axial direction, and is used to facilitate insertion of the helical member. When inserted into the tissue, the hel
