Correction of pseudophakia with laser-assisted in situ keratomileusis (LASIK): two-year follow-up.

We corrected the correction of a high myopia with a hyperopic addition in eyes with pseudophakia before the operation and after two years of follow-up. The spherical power of pseudophakia is calculated with a formula presented by Holladay. The corrected refractive errors were similar to that of the preoperative state, except in two eyes. The retreatment rate was 27.8%, and complications were few, and the results were stable. After ten months of follow-up with a hyperopic addition of 2.00 diopters (D), the uncorrected visual acuity of all patients was 20/20 or better.

Pseudophakic eyes with an uncorrected visual acuity of 20/20 or better two years after cataract surgery with a hyperopic addition may be safely, effectively, and stably corrected with laser-assisted in situ keratomileusis (LASIK). Impact of surface potential on the hydration dynamics of spherical colloids. We calculate the self-diffusion coefficient of hydrated colloidal particles and show that the corresponding surface potential causes different dynamics than those observed when hydration is absent. For sessile particles, a larger self-diffusion coefficient is obtained for neutral and larger particles; otherwise, the particle is immobile. On the basis of mode coupling theory and a scaling theory, we explain these findings and demonstrate how the different structure of the host fluid, caused by surface potential, affects the dynamics. Gastrointestinal stromal tumor presenting as a submucosal mass in the rectum 0cc13bf012
