Category Archives: The Weapons On my recent visit to the Bulwarks Museum in North Yorkshire, up the road from the Hethel estate where the WOODCUTS cutting day for the book is taking place, I was delighted to discover this tiny little exhibition on the subject of Malformed Swords. It was delivered in a very concise way, using a small model sword to illustrate the nature of the problem. The goal of the project by Tom Warghinot of Malformed Swords and Swords of Ill Repute on Twitter is to raise awareness of this subject. I had no idea. I like the idea of using the sword collection (with modern artwork) and the museum shop (with models of antique swords, including malformed and gangrenous ones) as a way of communicating the nature of the subject. This is one of a series of posts about the Woodcut Project, an effort to edit out offensive Wikipedia definitions of the Medieval Warfare theme, or at least provide a more contemporary view of the subject. I've previously discussed the idea, the process, the tools and some of the results but here are a few more illustrations, one of which is already included in the WOPedia - my own viewing of the 1870 edition, supplied for the purpose of consultation, is online as an example. Note: a blog about a book is incomplete without its ill effects. It's hard to overstate the importance of the weaponry in the history of the Medieval. Not that long ago, a battle was essentially a sporting event, a matter of front-liners getting momentum of determined attack and defense, of shields and cleaves and swords, of the gaps that presented themselves and the gaps that were closed, all expressed in terms of stone and arrows, javelins, and
