Click Here to Visit Download Center Go to Start/Run and type in regedit. Navigate to the HKEY_CLASSES_ROOT\dotnetv45_47 folder. Add a new DWORD value called "EnableMetrics" and a value of 1. Note that you could use the Win32 API to look at these values. (See the above links for further details.) In the same folder, go to the file Microsoft.DotNet.Core.AvailableVersions.NewVersion.txt and change the version number from 18.0.0 to 16.5.0. Save the file and quit regedit. Click Start and run I see the new version number when I check the version number: Open an application that supports Metrics and add a new item to the app. In the resulting app there are stats and charts for usage. All of those charts are very similar and many represent the same information. For example: And while I was checking it out, I noticed that the high end systems are slowing down with the new version: But I've done too much reporting this morning to return to this subject for a while.

Thermal stability of aqueous suspensions of n-nonylphenol ethoxylate surfactant. Characterization of the thermal stability of aqueous nonylphenol ethoxylate (NPEO) suspensions using various structural information, including solubility, viscosity, and a thermal conductivity probe was carried out. The influence of temperature and NPEO concentration on the thermal stability of three commercially available NPEO surfactants were investigated. Solubility measurements indicated that solubility decreased with increasing temperature and NPEO concentration. Samples were subjected to heating at four different isothermal conditions. The viscosity of all samples increased with increasing temperature. At higher temperatures, the thermal conductivity of all three samples decreased with increasing temperature, but the temperature dependence of thermal conductivity was very different at the different isothermal conditions. A significantly larger conductivity increase was observed in sample S3-5 at the elevated temperature of 180 degrees C compared to lower temperatures. The thermal conductivity of all samples decreased with increasing concentration at the lowest temperature. The temperature range in which the thermal conductivity changes was between 190 degrees C
