Using this data enables FIFA 22 to also capture the player's movements in the real world so that they can be rendered dynamically in the real game. This gives players an unparalleled level of realism and player personality that could not be replicated in real life. Additionally, the game will feature new video Player Career Management Technology, which will let players build their player by customizing their player stats as they play through a career mode. Players can unlock players and upgrade players. FIFA 22 delivers a wide range of new game modes, such as the Five-A-Side, where five players compete on the pitch at the same time. FIFA 22 will bring players around the world on a journey to become the greatest player in their country as they work toward the FIFA Ultimate Team Championship. With FIFA 20 in November last year, FIFA became the first FIFA game to feature over a million players in their Ultimate Team, so we expect FIFA 22 to continue that high level of quality and authenticity. Finally, we're introducing a FIFA Ultimate Team Legends - Yaya Touré Edition, commemorating the 25th anniversary of the FIFA game series. With FIFA 22, we continue to build on the success of FIFA 19, the best-selling game of 2018. We're very excited to share these updates with the worldwide community, and we look forward to taking our relationship with them to the next level. Many thanks. I can't think of any operator (unary or binary) that would take a template type as input, and if it were possible, I would expect the standard to define one or more operators (perhaps for cases where the type being tested for an implicit conversion with another type is a template type) An example of what I am thinking: `std::vector v(3, 5); int x = v.front(); // ERROR: no operator "front" or std::vector v(3, 5); int x = v[0]; // ERROR: no operator "["` Is such an operator possible? A: No, there is no such operator. C++ standard draft N3337 § 4.6.3/5: If a template
