Some were paid to the city and others to the state. They were built by the New York State Racing Commission, by private companies such as Maguire, and by the Electric Boat Company, the builder of Yankee Clipper, which was destroyed by fire in September 1974 and not replaced.. Images of the cutaway side show the main headlight is the same as the CSP which would make sense since Dana is using the CSP.

Q: Why use `std::move` on expensive objects? What is the benefit of using `std::move()` on expensive objects, like of a vector or (heavily) copy-ed content? I believe that typically the performance of a `std::move()` call is very fast, while the performance of a copy is much slower than what it is for small objects. So why would I use `std::move()` on something as expensive as a vector? Is the approach: If objects are cheap, use copy and if objects are expensive use `std::move()`? A: Using `std::move()` on expensive objects is indeed often unwise, because it might "move the content of a container" and hence create many copies of it. If the object is large, you can avoid this by using a `std::unique_ptr` or some other smart pointer:

auto big_thing = make_big_thing();
std::unique_ptr<big_thing_ptr>(std::move(big_thing)); //

Subscribe There are many different, many important, many extraordinary and admirable ways to run a business; it's hard to narrow it down to just one. Sure, there are many quite frankly bogus measures of success: dollar figures, growth, profit, efficiency, sustainability, your investor friends, your cap table. A lot of these are to be praised and to be pursued; none of them are the whole truth.

The reason such a diverse number of processes are adopted is because "enjoying the process,” as it were, isn’t enough. You also have to make money in the process. This is a generalization, but I believe that most executives (okay, all executives, quite possible) are drawn to business for the “joy,” not only because they hate the actual task of being an executive, but because they love watching the change of numbers, the number of market share, the revenue, the profits, and so on. The temptation is overwhelming.

“That’s me,” they think. “All I do is enjoy the process. And the truth is that if you are purely a “process” person, if you’re just into making lists or chasing numbers, you probably won’t be successful. Or you will be successful, but not in a sustainable, engaging way. You won’t wake up every day and say “it’s working.” But if you’re truly in it for the process, if you’re in it to enjoy your work and to see where it takes you, that is a way to be successful. Having said all that
