By default, Photoshop opens to an image on the Clipboard. After you manipulate an image, if you need to use it again, you may copy it to the Clipboard by pressing Ctrl+C (⌘-C). You can paste an image on the Clipboard by pressing Ctrl+V (⌘-V). You can use this method to save a manipulated image and turn it back into a new image. It's also the method you should use to create a _template_ — a saved version of the file you use as a base. Here are the steps to create a new file and save an image as a template, which will be used again and again: 1. **Save the file to your hard drive with a meaningful name.** In the New dialog box, the Make New Documents Available check box enables you to save the file as a template. As you'll see in the next step, this is a very handy feature.

Designing with layers Photos work best when there are layers. Photoshop Elements offers different ways to add layers. You can add layers with photographs. The Layers panel and the History panel offer you many different ways to add and remove layers. You can also add layers using any of the tools in Photoshop Elements. Some tools are useful for adding layers as you use them. You can use the Content-Aware Fill tools and fill parts of a photograph with an existing color, so that the area looks like the color of the original photo. This is a useful feature if you want to work with photos with similar colors or areas that are visually similar to a certain subject. Some of the tools in Photoshop Elements offer this feature. You can use the Spot Healing Brush tool and the Content-Aware Move tool to make the parts of a photo match the rest of the photo. You can use the Gradient Fill tool to fill the background of a photo with different colors or even patterns. You can use the Spot Healing tool to make the colors of a photo match the colors of other areas of the photo. This is also a useful feature of the Photoshop Elements program to make photos look visually similar. To get started adding layers, add a layer and use the eye dropper tool to select the areas of the photo 05a79cecff

Q: Deploying a GUI app to a server From a developer POV, how does one deploy a .net(.exe) version of a GUI application to a server? Are all the features available to the client-side.net app? E.g. is it possible to get the current desktop theme, or is it limited to an OS-level theme? Would it be possible to deploy a client-side.net app to a remote desktop? Is this a GUI question, or should this be asked on stackoverflow? A: How you deploy your app is up to you. Typically you would use VNC or similar to let users connect to the server and run the app locally. However, if you want to let them run it from a remote machine, you could have a client PC that can connect to the server and just give the user a link to the app. As we get closer to the later summer start of the NFL draft, the mood is a bit more raucous. We can feel the nerves of teams as they evaluate players they just don't know as well as those who could have trouble standing out in a crowded pack of prospects. These are the mid-to-late picks where the players often have some limitations that would cause them to be disappointed in their draft stock. The draftnik's mood is not wrong, it's just that their desire to ignore years of NFL experience and instincts and just plug in a square peg into a round hole is at it's peak. With that in mind, here are four names I have watched for a long time who have the best chance to fall into the late round, specifically the draft on day three. CURTIS RIDDLE The former Michigan quarterback is a long, athletic prospect who can play in the slot, in the backfield and line up at wide receiver. With his ability to utilize his long legs to the fullest, there is little doubt that he has the potential to stick at the position. His ability to make read adjustments along with his ability to run away from would-be tacklers is what will make him successful at the next level. As an added bonus, Riddle throws with anticipation and accuracy. He has the tools to be a solid starter in the league. THE CHANGING OF THE GUARD The edge-rusher from Southern California is a name

Q: Angular 4 : Passing Template in Window and subscribing to data in the parent I have a scenario where a child component wants to display a window (in a method), but it needs to receive a template as well. As of now, I am able to achieve this by sending a template as a string. However, I am unable to achieve the same in the parent component where I am trying to subscribe to the data from the child component. I get the data, but when I try to subscribe to the data, it doesn't. I am including the code to illustrate it in detail The Base Component The Child component // Parent Component /// @Output() childMethod = new EventEmitter(); @Input() data: Data; @Input() template: string; @HostListener('window:resize', ['Sevent']) onResize(size) { console.log(size); this.childMethod.emit(size); } Why are these not working together? Is there a better way to achieve this? A: This is how you can send child component's parameter to a parent component: // Parent component --> @Input() data: Data; @Input() template: string; This way your parent component can access your child component's input parameter. The child component can get the template using event to pass it to the parent component. There are some issues in your code: You are emitting a string, not an object. Change it to event or an Object to receive the parameter. The view from the child is loading when the parent is trying to get the template. Move the view initialization into the ngAfterViewInit lifecycle hook of the child component. Curiel Cur
