JPEG The JPEG (pronounced _jay-peg_) file format is one of the most widely used image file formats. It's the format most people think of when they hear the word _image_. The most common way you'll encounter JPEG files is as photographs taken with a digital camera. JPEG is a compressed file format. Most readers are familiar with how this process works: The JPEG file format is one of the standard ways photographers compress an image so it will save space. In other words, a JPEG file is smaller than the original file, and it has fewer colors than the original. JPEG's smaller file size is of particular value to you because when you print a large number of photos, you want to save as much paper as possible. In contrast, the TIFF file format is designed to maximize the number of colors you can store in a single file. JPEG files have different levels of compression. They are mostly lossy — in other words, they lose a certain amount of image information. Because of this compression, you may find JPEG files look quite different than the original image. * Noise: Although this quality degradation of a JPEG file is not noticeable when the picture is viewed on a computer screen, the image quality will not be as good as the original when printed. * Flawless: To keep file sizes down, the image quality can be set at a maximum of 100 percent, and no image information is lost. * Hi-Quality: The image is a near copy of the original. Although the file sizes for the lowest compression settings are very small, you'll quickly run out of memory when you use an image at Hi-Quality. To avoid that problem, try setting the compression at 50 percent and save the image in a _lossless_ format. (For more information on this process, see the section "Choosing a photo layout.") JPEG files can be created and saved in a variety of different color depths. The easiest way to tell if a JPEG file is lossless is to look for the 0xFF00FF00 text in the image's header. * The color depth of 8 bits is commonly used for images on monitors. * If you see 0xFF00FF00 in the file's header, the image is lossless and the highest quality is available. * The color

Residents of a tiny South Australia island say they are fed up with boats blocking their access to the ocean. Two weeks ago, a boat filled with crates washed ashore in the tiny community of Wreck Reef. Some residents said they believed it was being used to smuggle drugs, but they say they do not have the right tools to test this theory. "Look, I've got a bottle of vodka I'd like to sell you, but what am I gonna do? Chuck it in my car and then jump in the water? No, there's a bike and some other stuff too," resident Peter Larsson said. He said "smugglers" had arrived on the island and they were using a boat to take asylum seekers to Christmas Island. "They don't ask them, they just take them in whatever form of transport they're coming," he said. "We're just trying to get out there and do a good clean-up job." The boats will likely be gone by the weekend when the South Australian Maritime Safety Authority (SAMSA) returns. "That's why it's really important that we go and muck it up," he said. "Cause once they get that stuff off the beach it'll be all these reports and they'll be able to pick up the cars and bikes and stuff and take them out to that boat and stuff that's been left on the beach." Residents in Wreck Reef are confused about where they can bring their boats if the authorities are not going to pick them up. (ABC News: Giulio Saggin) Ms Larsson said there was no point going to Port Lincoln for help, as nothing would be done for a week. "All my family in Sweden are going to phone up, saying 'are you going to pick up the boat?' But they're on the other end of the phone so I can't say, 'don't worry about it, it'll be fine'." GSA chief executive Bob Gillard told the ABC the operation to pick up the boats required a specialised crew and a helicopter. "We've got a lot of work to do to comply with the Protocol (which covers the issue of customs and immigration and the service of process for civil and commercial cases), which means that we'd have to get all the police involved, all the state fire service involved. We'd have to have the SWAT team on board, we'd Routine screening for fetal chromosomal abnormalities has led to a 60-fold increase in the number of terminations of pregnancy due to aneuploidy. This article describes the ultrasound and maternal serum screening findings for one such case of trisomy 13. Attention is drawn to the problems involved in the diagnosis and management of this condition. The pitfalls of non-specific ultrasound findings and the possible effects on the perinatal outcome are also highlighted.Q: QDialog of size equal to parent window I have QDialog where I want to place the camera. All works fine, but it differs for different monitor sizes. So I have set the size of the dialog is equal to the size of the window, but it doesn't work like that. What I want is in the figure below: window frame = (100,100,200,200) camera is set as 1300,300,600,600 dialog frame = (1300,300,600,600) It works fine if I had e.g. 3200 width and 3200 height. But if I resize the window to higher height, camera will be in the lower position.
