Numerous sampling methods are known in the prior art for detecting low levels of analytes in liquids. In many instances, a sample collection device is connected to an analytical test device, such as a test strip having an absorbent medium for collecting and holding the test sample. The sample is typically analyzed, or tested, for the presence of an analyte. One or more test compounds, or reagents, are applied to the sample in a device which produces a measurable response to the presence of the analyte. While such sampling and analytical methods are being used in a wide variety of applications, problems sometimes arise with the methods which have heretofore not been satisfactorily solved. In particular, many test procedures do not provide an acceptable margin of safety, or degree of accuracy and reproducibility. For example, a sample is obtained from an individual through a membrane or filter. The material which passes through the membrane will have some level of analyte present in it. However, the conventional use of membranes which come into contact with the sample often results in the presence of both an interfering substance and the analyte. The interfering substance interferes with the analytical test, and the presence of the interfering substance in the sample can result in an inaccuracy and uncertainty in the test result. Accordingly, it is an object
