Episodic events of protein damage and their molecular consequences, including accumulation of senescent/oxidized proteins, nucleic acids, lipids, and the proteome, as well as signaling alterations are predicted to generate a time-dependent increase in senescent, oxidized, and/or damaged proteins, nucleic acids, lipids, and proteomes (termed senescent, oxidized, and/or damaged proteinsome, senescent, oxidized, and/or damaged lipoproteome, and senescent, oxidized, and/or damaged proteome, respectively). We propose that generation of these compounds by protein damage during aging may initiate a cellular repair/recovery process aimed at restoring homeostasis (termed fracture-repair). Here, we describe evidence suggesting that senescent/oxidized proteins, nucleic acids, and lipids and/or their damaged counterparts may be subjected to fracture-repair in the nervous system. Three processes are recognized as central to fracture-repair: (1) protein clearance (by lysosomes, autophagy, and/or degradation by the proteasome), (2) protein replacement (by ubiquitination/substitution, microglia activation, and/or lysosomal activity), and (3) removal of damaged nucleic acids and lipids (by lysosomes). In light of
