Idea I wrote this concept as an internal blog post, while I was at university. At the time I thought it would be a good fit for the site, so I 're-released' it a couple of times. I feel the game is ready for the wider audience, so that's what this blog post is about.

Or Or Back to Top Home Public Housing's Problematic Housing Cycles The majority of PH residents experience stabilized homes on some portion of their development life cycle. However, 42% of PH residents housed on APMs experience negative housing cycles. A negative housing cycle is defined as vacancies, evictions, and/or homelessness while the resident is living in the development. It follows that 42% of PH residents being housed on some portion of their development life cycle are experiencing a negative housing cycle! The cost and time involved in stabilizing vacant apartments/condos is fundamental to the stabilization effort. However, the issue of stabilizing family and/or senior households can be especially challenging and further exacerbates the problem. Philadelphia's Link-Up program costs $6.9 million in taxpayer dollars each year to house senior and family residents. In addition to the costly terms, families may be placed in temporary apartment/condo while their renovation application is being processed. After years of advocating for the creation of a viable resident/tenant voice, public housing has responded. To benefit residents and reduce the estimated cost of stabilization and negative housing cycles the City of Philadelphia has added a staff position to coordinate a comprehensive campaign to: Turn positive resident/tenant views around (a better way of saying: we need to take resident/tenant complaints seriously, and we need to serve residents and tenants effectively and efficiently); Change resident/tenant perceptions of vacant units; Reduce public housing turnovers, i.e.

in front of the television in the chill of a late January evening, a comfortable 59-year-old woman in the far-off Cambodian province of Battambang sips on strong coffee: "I would so love to see that. You are following?" My Thai colleague nods, leaning forwards, eyes gleaming. "You will never, ever guess what I just found out about that show!" I bury my nose back in the book I have been reading about the Khmer Rouge, and better that I do, because I know that soon I will be giving my whole-hearted attention to a television screen that I never thought would show itself here. The invention relates to an axial piston pump with a housing part consisting of an aluminum sheet metal part and with an encapsulated rotor running in a companion receptacle situated on the housing part, a plurality of enclosed pump chambers for the arrangement of at least one grooved piston being connected to at least one intake and at least one discharge valve. Pumps of the above-mentioned type are useful as suction-forming pumps and also as pressure-forming pumps. Suction-forming pumps are used, for example, in the case of portable water-supply engineering. Pressure-forming pumps are used, for example, for the mobile transportation of fluid matter, for example as feed or compression pumps in subway trains and as differential pressure pumps in continuously working machines, for example as mining machines or excavation machines, with machines being known, for example, from the journal Feld- and Kraftverwertung (Mining and Metallurgical Processing) 24 (1992), page 1150. Axial piston pumps, particularly three-blade pumps, have been known, for example, for a number of years from the product brochure of the company Sxling-Kiepe et al. Our inspection shows, however, that these axial piston pumps cannot
