I spent some time with Photoshop Elements and tried to find out whether it's enough to do the work you need to do. I've used it to create a wide variety of images, from high-resolution print material, to a low-resolution version used for social media and text. In this article, I'll explain how I managed to combine the features of Photoshop and Photoshop Elements into one powerful tool. I'll share what I learned from doing that and whether it's worth the effort. Please also see my previous articles on using Photoshop and Photoshop Elements on Linux. Editing photos The most effective tool I used was Adobe Bridge, the photo management software included in Photoshop Elements. Bridge is a good place for beginners to spend time to find out the basics of editing photos. For more in-depth editing, Photoshop is very convenient for the tasks I needed. It is very fast and easy to use, and offers the most features. I tend to use Photoshop when I have to resample an image to a different size — for example, to create a high-resolution print. Photoshop is good at resizing images, and it's faster than any of the other tools I used. But if I want to edit simple things like brightness, color, and contrast, I go for Photoshop Elements. I find it much easier to use Photoshop Elements. Photoshop Elements also has a great selection of simpler editing functions — like removing red eyes or blurring a face. Of course, you can easily save Photoshop documents as PSD files and import them into Photoshop Elements to get started. But if you want to edit with more control, you can open a Photoshop file and change anything you want within Photoshop Elements. A Photoshop layer is a useful tool for manipulating graphics. There are a number of ways to use layers in Photoshop: High resolution high quality (don't forget the Pro version is needed to edit the larger files) Portrait mode and landscape mode If you're printing really big images, make sure to use the highest resolution for the print. If you want to have a clear and sharp picture, you'll have to use the highest resolution in all areas. This usually requires a Pro version. Making PDFs and EPS files If I want to have a nicely paginated and numbered PDF file of my photo, I usually use the 05a79cecff

Toronto's Hayate Agasa is filled with potential for much more than any one swimmer. She was the world's top junior in the 50 free at age 17 when she ended 2013 with a personal best in that event of 23.27. Two months later, at age 18, she also broke a Junior Pan Pacific Games record when she won her event in a sizzling 23.09. The women's 50 free is this week's main attraction at the Toronto Olympic Swimming Trials. Hayate, who is 17, is a member of the Canadian team and in this event, she has the advantage of being compared to world-class swimmers like South Africa's Darian Townsend, Japan's Saki Ariyoshi, and China's Feifei Wang. Story continues below advertisement It will be an Olympics for her on many levels: as Canada's first representative in the 50 free, as the first Japanese woman to make it to an Olympics since 2004, and as a Japanese-born Canadian who prefers to use the Japanese flag to write "Canada" on her hand. In her first international appearance, at age 11, Hayate was less than five feet tall. Now, she stands more than five feet. "I was a junior last year, and I was working hard," Hayate said in the Brampton, Ont., pool that hosted the Trials, last Friday. "Now I am really pushing for the Olympics." The Trials start in the 50 free on Friday evening. In the 200 free, 20-year-old Caeleb Dressel of South Africa leads a fast field. He finished with a time of 1 minute, 47.84 seconds. Hayate said her 50 free time, from Japan's 2015 Junior Pan Pacific Championships in Hawaii, was 23.65 seconds, and she also has a 2015 Junior Pan Pacific Games record of 23.09. "If I go to the Olympics, this year, I can show my best time and qualify," Hayate said. Hayate says she really loves the more technical swim strokes and, when she has time, practises them at the pool. She also enjoys playing basketball, the same sport she'll be swimming to qualify for the Olympics. Story continues below advertisement The trouble is that she doesn't have nearly as much time for practice as she would like. "The reason why I am not in the senior team is because I do not

Beekeeping in Sardinia, Italy: the ecology and management of the wild bee and bumblebee pollinators of the region. Sardinia is an island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated approximately 90 km north from the Italian peninsula. It is a typical Mediterranean island with a mild and temperate climate, that supports several ecosystems from low altitude to the Mounts Barbarossa, Su Nuraxi and Medaglianzi. The long history of human presence and intensive use of the island is evident in the use of ancestral agricultural traditions such as Neolithic settlements and Bronze Age and Classical/Roman centres. The area is recognized for its production of traditional olive oil, honey and pollen. The area includes a variety of landscapes from the coastline to the massifs of Sardinia. Due to its geographical features, the landscape of the island has been transformed at different times over the last few millennia. The mountain ranges, the villages, the towns, the plains and the coastlines all present a contrast of habitats and they are divided by ecological areas. From the coastal areas to Mount Antelminella, Mount Sciara district, the Lavanza massif and the mine at Pila d'Istria, the different ecosystems and landscapes of the island are recognized in the area. The paper aims to describe the wild pollinators of Sardinia, which are recognized as endemic and very important in the island. The purposes of the study were to consider the main components of the ecological network of wild pollinators, to evaluate and identify conservation priorities for the species and to identify the most significant sites for conservation management and protection of these species. Data about the species richness of wild bees and bumblebees in Sardinia are very limited, so they were collected from literature searches and the data available from the Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew (As much as possible, data were collected as unpublished studies, from published works and from local records. The data of the most common species are based on 10 years (2007-2016) of bee fauna for the island of Sardinia. A total of 245 species of bees and bumblebees, out of a total of 340 species of bees (604 families) and bumblebees (236 families), were identified. The total bee fauna of the island is relatively small, with 76 species and it is poor in terms of species diversity. Four species of Apidae and two of Bombidae were collected at the beginning of this decade. Eleven
