CNN's 'full-blown lie' about Paul Manafort There's video to see of the interview with Anderson Cooper, on the eve of the trial of Paul Manafort. There are excerpts in print media, even the Times has the same (but not yet the same as the video, which will appear this afternoon or evening in the media). Just take a look at this: CNN's Anderson Cooper on Tuesday refused to call the FBI's wiretap warrant on the personal and business cellphones of Paul Manafort's accuser a "wiretap." "It's just a wireless tap on a cellphone. The metadata is what the government said about the information they can get," Cooper told former Manafort deputy Rick Gates as he sat in a jail cell awaiting trial in the Special Counsel Robert Mueller's Russia probe. Cynics would say that it isn't technically a 'wiretap' because the tapping wasn't done on an actual telephone line, and therefore it's not really on a 'phone line'. In fact, the FBI literally dug trenches to hide the wire below a road in Washington, with a T-shaped metal tip attached to the phone lines and an additional T on the other end, which they connected to a listening device. Cooper's statement is a full blown lie — the product of an agenda-driven media propagandizing. It's not technically a lie. It's a half truth in service of lying. It is a lie. But it's not technically a lie. Cooper isn't a trained journalist. Therefore, there's no way the average joe in America who watches CNN and the like would ever notice. But the media loves to do this, and they will. Media always spin and distort things. But that half truth thing? Don't mess with that. Cooper told an outright lie to the effect that it was not technically a wire tap. That's a lie, and he should've known better. It was a half truth, but that half truth was not a lie. He's the liar.
