Hyperparathyroidism is a disease that affects the bone, kidney, and vascular system. Although parathyroid hormone has a key role in this disease, the potential contribution of humoral factors has also been emphasized. Tumors of the parathyroid glands are the most common cause of the disease. The most common symptom is renal calcification, which occurs in 95% of patients with parathyroid cancer. Parathyroid carcinomas can produce symptoms by direct invasion of a vital organ, including bone and the thymus. The bone involvement results in pain and fractures. Some authors believe that the natural history of the tumor is grim; most patients die within 5 years after clinical diagnosis. Local excision of the tumor may prolong the disease-free period. Kidney involvement of hyperparathyroidism occurs in many patients, often with grossly normal kidneys. Vascular complications occur in 50% to 70% of patients and usually involve the coronary arteries. Some authors feel that with better identification of patients at high risk for vascular disease, there will be a reduction in the occurrence of vascular complications. John Thompson (football
