strumgs2keygencrackQ: Ruby/Rails internationalization & good practice for localization

I am working on an e-commerce website for the first time. The site is built on Ruby on Rails. The first language I am working in is English. Once I am done with the English version of the site, I will be switching languages, so that the website is available in Dutch, Polish and Russian. My question is, what are the pros and cons of storing the Spanish localization files right next to the .rb file and the English localization files in the same directory, i.e. in the same ROOT directory? In other words, I am already working on a Ruby file for Spanish, should I just branch it out with a .es.rb? What if I decide to work on German localization at some point? What is the best approach for this? Thanks in advance, JLH

A: You can do this. You might want to do it in separate directories for English (en) and Spanish (es). Ruby on Rails does not have methods for switching to different languages.

Acquired resistance to cefotaxime in a preterm neonate with Burkholderia cepacia infection. The genotype of Burkholderia cepacia recovered from a preterm neonate with meningitis and pneumonia complicated by respiratory failure was compared to the genotype of the organism isolated from a urinary catheter in the neonate's mother. Both were serotype I isolates. However, the neonatal isolate had a different antibiotic resistance pattern, with cefotaxime being ineffective (MIC = 16 microg/ml). PCR amplification and sequencing of the gyrB gene of the neonatal isolate revealed that it was a new genotype, distinct from
