Various types of footwear have been designed with closed toe portions (i.e. intended to enclose a wearer's foot or toe) to protect the toe or toes of the wearer from being exposed to the elements. Also, various types of protective footwear have been designed for work and sports uses in which the wearer's foot and/or toes must be protected from contact with sharp objects, such as a ladder, post or other upright object, that may be present in the work or sports environment, as well as from contact with the ground. Because of the fragile nature of a wearer's toes and/or feet, protective footwear generally provides little lateral support for the wearer's toe or toes. Thus, if a heel of the wearer should come into contact with a sharp object, the wearer will normally experience substantial discomfort. Prior art protective footwear, such as work boots, ladder boots and the like, generally do not include lateral protection at the toe end to protect the wearer's toes, and it is thus possible for a wearer of those types of footwear to accidentally toe their foot, or toe their toe, into a sharp object or the ground, and to then feel and experience discomfort as a result. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for protective footwear having closed toe ends to protect a wearer's toe or toes, and which includes structure to provide lateral support to the wearer's toe or toes as the wearer moves about in the footwear.AT&T has a new home called the WarnerMedia Zone, featuring all sorts of content and services.
