Hypocalcemia is common in patients with metastatic cancer and some cancers may cause osteomalacia. The pathophysiology of bone metastases causing hypocalcemia is not completely understood, but a novel bone metastasis-induced hypocalcemia-inducing factor is suspected. In this report, two patients with cancer-induced osteomalacia are presented. Serum ionized calcium levels measured by an electrochemical luminescence immunoassay were significantly decreased. Serum levels of intact parathyroid hormone (PTH) in the patients were not significantly altered, while that of 25-hydroxyvitamin D3 was mildly increased. Levels of alkaline phosphatase (ALP) and osteocalcin were normal. Metastases in both patients were detected on bone scans and showed an osteolytic pattern. Histological specimens from the patients' bone metastases showed lymphoid cell infiltrates with fibrosis or chronic oste
