Parallels Desktop 13.Q: What is the difference between kbench and kcachegrind? I am new to profiling a c application. I am looking for simple profiling tool. I found kcachegrind and kbench. Am I miss anything here?? A: Kcachegrind is a graph based profiler for C code. As it is built into KDE, it includes a large number of features (for example, session management) as well as a large number of plugins. kbench is a simple throughput measurement tool. It is more simple than the KCachegrind in many ways, and it works fine for that type of profiling. A: On the other hand, KCachegrind has much more functionality than kbench. A simple usage example for KCachegrind is: Load software and run test with valgrind kcachegrind will draw a screenshot of valgrind then you start profiling with different parameters. If you hit a printf() in your code, it will show the source code line with the statement If you hit a malloc(), it will show the function call which may include parameters If you hit a malloc(), it will show where you are allocating (line, file, function, variable) .
