Although it has been suggested that the standard form of medical care given by a medical professional for a human patient is an assurance of a specific outcome, or at least that medical care entails a risk of an outcome and the assurance of that outcome, the basic structural elements of medical care and the relationship of the doctor to the patient or his family has not changed substantially in the past. Moreover, the relationship of the patient or patient's family to the doctor or his associates is primarily consensual, and is not a true contract. Under these conditions, it appears that the patient's conception of the assurance given by the medical doctor is most likely that of a performance. The ability of the patient or patient's family to assess the accuracy of the doctor's prognosis and to assess the benefits of medical treatments over other possible treatments would seem to depend upon a number of factors. One factor would be the verbal description of the doctor given by the patient, but unfortunately doctors tend to speak in generalities and may not provide details of the nature of the disease or other attributes which may be important. Another factor would be the personal interaction between doctor and patient, but such communication between a patient and a doctor may be limited by the patient's ability to communicate effectively, by the doctor's ability to communicate effectively, and by the patient's ability to communicate effectively. Under these conditions, the ability to determine the value of a treatment would seem to depend upon the intelligence and education of the patient, and his awareness of the advantages of different types of treatments. The disease is sometimes best treated in the environment where it first appears, although this requires an expensive and time consuming journey to the patient. It has been pointed out that a different or more effective treatment may be available if the disease is treated in the environment where it first appears, although it may be inconvenient or difficult to so treat the patient. It is known to provide a medical device which permits a doctor to make or input a prognosis, and to transmit this prognosis to 6d1f23a050
