Optimal management of patients with cerebral peduncular infarction (CPI) is still challenging. Review of the clinical presentations and outcome of patients with CPI. An Internet search using the terms "cerebral peduncular infarction," "central pontine myelinolysis," and "lateral medullary syndrome" was performed. Studies that described cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) and plasma levels of neurofilament light chain protein (NfL) were also identified. Clinical features of CPI are variable. Patients usually present with limb weakness and dysphagia. Cranial nerve deficits are less common. A combination of dysphagia and gait/coordination changes should alert the clinician to an underlying CPI. Headache and altered mental status should raise suspicion of central pontine myelinolysis. Results of blood tests including NfL levels are usually normal. CSF NfL levels are higher in patients with central pontine myelinolysis. Acute CPI is often a single infarction, whereas patients with partial infarcts on diffusion-weighted imaging and magnetic resonance imaging should be treated as having a chronic CPI. Misdiagnosis of CPI leads to inappropriate treatment and increased morbidity.using LibVLCSharp.Forms.EventArgs; using LibVLCSharp.Forms.Forms; using LibVLCSharp.Forms.Views; using LibVLCSharp.Util; namespace PlaylistEditor { public class SourcePlayerControl : PlayerControl { private readonly Func _media; public SourcePlayerControl(c6a93da74d
