FreeLoxosceles dorsalis Loxosceles dorsalis is a spider of the genus Loxosceles, commonly known as the sand-box spider. It is the most poisonous spider found in the United States. Distribution L. dorsalis is one of the most poisonous spiders in the United States and is common in most of the country. Like other spiders in the Loxosceles genus, the female can be identified by a distinctive chelicerae, which look like a mating comb. The female's fangs, which are used to inject the venom, are between 0.5 to 1.0 mm in length, while males are around 0.5 mm. The bites of female spiders may be more painful than those of males. Sand-box spiders are found throughout the country, and are often seen in dark, open or sunny areas, which are usually near water. Venom and toxicity The venom of the sand-box spider consists of complex protein molecules called phospholipase A, metalloproteinases, hyaluronidases, and histamine. Sand-box spider venom causes blistering and necrosis through the release of enzymes within the body of the victim. A bite or sting from a female spider will cause the victim to develop a bullseye-shaped area of dead tissue that looks like a large bullseye which turns a reddish-purple. The area of necrosis will die, leaving a central red spot. The venom is not toxic to mammals, but it is toxic to insects and fish. Other spiders of the Loxosceles genus produce the same toxins, but they are less dangerous. Environment

The sand-box spider has a very wide geographical distribution. They are found mostly in the western part of the United States. They can be found throughout most of Canada and even in some parts of Europe. A recent study of different populations of L. dorsalis found significant genetic divergence based on morphological traits. In addition to geographic isolation, a number of adaptive factors have likely contributed to this divergence, including a pre-zygotic isolation based on mate recognition, an increase in the expression of chemical defenses, and a reduction in the duration of the seasonal breeding season. Research In the 1940s, in New Zealand, people began to notice loxoscelism, which is the medical term for the effects of envenomation from a spider bite. In 1950, Dr. Paul Donald W. Merkle used supernumerary legs (legs more than normal for his species) of L. laeta, a related species, on an operculum of his own species, L. reclusa. Eventually he realized that his own experiment actually confirmed the presence of two genes and, years later, with the help of Jay H. Williams and Douglas Wallace, he founded a formal Loxosceles Research Department at the University of California, Riverside. In 2011, researchers discovered a way to prevent loxoscelism by removing the venom-delivery proteins that the spider injects into the bite. This modification has been called Pm30 and is set to be used in a "trial phase" that will begin next year. This protein has been found in six Loxosceles species. The goal is to apply it to a jellyfish, and when a bite lands in jellyfish, the venom proteins would be neutralized.
