huaweis official accessories and cases are as stylish as youd expect from a company with these devices in its catalog. youll get a good variety of different covers for the phone, including an all-plastic version, leather and silicon cases, and of course some funky colorful covers. in the box, youll also get a pair of flat earbuds. finally, we tried out the p9 around san francisco with a plastic case, and it was surprisingly comfortable to use in spite of the large battery. although not everyone will feel the same, the p9 fits in the hand well, and its fine to hold for extended periods of time. its not as slippery as the g5 or the galaxy s7, but its not particularly grippy, either. the p9 is a fine phone, but its not a flagship. huawei needs to step up the software update process, because the company has a lot of catching up to do. the p9 should get a score of 100k in the latest antutu benchmarks as it now comes with a beefy kirin 960 chipset and 3gb of ram. huawei should be able to keep this up with emui 5.0 on top of it, and build on its current momentum. to sum it up, the huawei p9 has some great components, but it also feels like a step backwards. its an improved upgrade over the p8, but its still missing the kind of gimmicks that make for an enticing iphone or a more focused google pixel. about the author:richard adhikari is a contributor to readwrite web. he has written about a wide range of technology subjects, including open source projects, online organizations, and google. read more of his articles here. about the author:richard adhikari is a contributor to readwrite web. he has written about a wide range of technology subjects, including open source projects, online organizations, and google. read more of his articles here. 5ec8ef588b
