each device, application, or online service that you use regularly is able to store a username and password for you, all in one place. this makes it easy to log into your accounts on a new computer, a new mobile device, or even a new browser, without having to remember your username and password. when you are ready to log in, just select a username and password from the keychain and you're good to go. the keychain also keeps a record of all of your usernames and passwords in an encrypted, highly-secure format, so even if someone does get access to your data, they won't be able to decrypt it. by default, the keychain is located inside the `/users//library/keychains/` directory. if you're the only user of your computer, that keychain will be named `login.keychain`. if you have more than one user on your mac, you'll have a different keychain for each user. once you've installed your password manager, you can add users to the keychain by connecting your devices to your computer and signing in with the username and password that you want to use. you may also need to create a new keychain for each new device that you add to your computer. keychains also contain usernames and passwords that you add manually, so you can use your keychain to store all of the passwords that you need. if you store passwords for your online accounts in your keychain, when you sign into those accounts, the keychain will automatically fill in your username and password. keychains are especially useful if you use more than one device, because you can have a single username and password that you can use to access all of your different accounts on all of your devices. to add new usernames and passwords to your keychain, select keychain access from the application folder. click the preferences button and then select change keychain on the left. then, click the plus (+) icon at the top of the window to add a new keychain. give the new keychain a name, and type a password that you'll use to protect the keychain. then click the login button at the bottom of the window.
