The keystroke functions were commonly used to help people create PINs, so they also had a USB breakout to provide the same functionality from a desktop PC. Which seems harmless enough at first, but there is a lot more to it than meets the eye. On that desktop PC, a malicious user could easily have setup a fraudulent payment system (using a card scanner/reader that weren't really intended to read cards) which would have been super easy to do given that many businesses can't tell the difference between normal and legitimate BlackBerry payment reader terminals. Card scanners have been around since the first terminal devices were designed. The DeltaClick Secure Wallet by Secure Computing has a built-in reader that was essentially the same thing as the military BlackBerry reader. And both weren't for sale to the general public. However, the CDC and others have been able to re-use the hardware for their own personal use (like the VeriFone reader in the next section) because the devices are locked down to only work with terminals that they have been pre-approved by. The VeriFone 925 is made by the same company that makes the fiscal aspect of the BlackBerry phone, so it's no surprise that the device is very expensive. And with this added equipment, it even makes a little more sense that the price is skyrocketing. The VeriFone 925CTLS is almost as good as the real thing, and it's also capable of accepting or generating multi-currency payments. This means that a bank could very well have a VeriFone 925 terminal at its main branch and then the same terminal at one of its automatic teller machines, allowing a customer to pay with the same card at either location.

However, this is just the tip of the iceberg. By pairing with all kinds of proprietary protocols, the device can be used in almost any environment. If a cash register has an integrated PIN pad, any retailer will still have the option to support BB10 payments. A retail point of sale device will be in the best position to take advantage of this, however, as they'll often have the most support for a card reader. - accessibility to all BlackBerry web apps (including BBM for Mobile) - This is a web page that offers a library of all apps available on BlackBerry devices. This is very useful if you are blind and/or cannot install a browser extension. - text normalization and screen magnification for PDFs and other documents- This one is a browser add-on for BlackBerry. It allows you to zoom in/out of the screen when viewing PDFs and other documents. As for voice search, the performance was horrendous in my tests, even with the built-in text-to-speech (TTS). Apps like Evernote have TTS built-in, but BlackBerry hub is not one of them (there are apps like Smart Search ). For its low-end price tag, I think most users should consider a standalone TTS device. If you are considering a BlackBerry, I would suggest to purchase an iJollys™ Fixit TTS (which has been just released, and included in my review package). While the screen reading functionality on the BlackBerry Q10 is OK - its not perfect and there are a few quirks that can be worked around. In my limited use, it did not work well with the phone calls or messages apps. The screen reader would sometimes read the name of the call or message when the contact or text from the caller was read aloud in the background. If you dont want to use a separate device, you can always try some of the various iOS or Android applications that include voice recognition and text-to-speech technology. 5ec8ef588b
