Smaller family planning grants have been made available for population program activities. In 1976, the President approved an additional $44 million to the Title X programs; however, the proposed budget for the 1978 fiscal year was zero, effectively terminating funding of Title X projects. Over the next decade, Congress passed five separate temporary funding measures to support family planning. These measures varied in the scope of family planning services they funded, and, in particular, they did not fund any abortions in the programs. In 1990, Congress added new matching restrictions, which effectively prohibited the use of Title X funds for abortion services, including for abortion as an inducement or in payment for sterilization, except in cases of rape or incest. From 1991 to 1995, Title X funding grew by over $40 million per year. During this period, Congress, responding to the growing popularity of the Plan B patch, inserted language into the 1992 National Defense Authorization Act allowing the Secretary of Defense to transfer up to $1 million in Title X funds to the Department of Defense to pay for Plan B and its use as a method of emergency contraception. This provision, however, was never formally approved. Nevertheless, it was widely understood that the provision was being implemented and that the funds were being used. These funds were made available through the Departments of the Army, Defense, Health and Human Services, and Veterans Affairs, and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which were all funded through the same appropriation. Additional funding was made available for family planning services after the 'Plan B' decision was made by the FDA. The final budget bill provided that Title X funding could be used by the Secretary of Health and Human Services to provide up to $1 million per year to any public or private non-Federal entity to implement a medical emergency contraceptive method approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

the epubcatalog is our primary mission-driven, peer-reviewed collection that spans many different disciplines. our goal is to provide access to all levels of scholarship and help funders find the right work for their work. the epubcatalog provides free access to online collections, and abstracts and indexing for all major e-journal publishers and other key abstracting services. it also provides access to ebooks, for download or streaming. we are always working to find new and more effective ways to provide access to the research you need. with the same degree of expertise that the editors command, the council for research excellence (core) of the national library of australia will collate publications on the very latest developments in social sciences and humanities research, criticism, theory, methodology, and method. it is our intention to remain faithful to the diverse set of definitions of such terms as human, society, and culture. while we define human activity in a very broad sense, we are also aware that there are limits to this definition, and that certain human activities can be subsumed under other categories. we recognise that the concept of society is both a broad and a composite one, but we want to stress the principles of unity and diversity, and the importance of the plurality of interests that are gathered under the general heading of society. for example, when the term social is used in an artistic sense, we wish to distinguish the concept of sociology from the related but different concept of the sociological. there is a whole world of scholarship, theories, and concepts that fall under the heading of the sociological. 5ec8ef588b
