The mysterious and spectacular Trojan Horse in ancient Greek history was a wooden horse, now mostly destroyed. The patterned horse decorations are modeled after the patterned decoration that was found on the wall of an ancient Greek structure. There is a detailed description of the decoration (and its meaning) in Paolo Schipizzi's 1995 book, "Warrior Cults and the Trojan Horse Legend". Here, I post the key words of that discussion, and update the post by adding the correspondence between the decoration pattern and the nine war scenes depicted on the "Horse of Aeschylus". The decoration is a representation of the surface of a mountain. The pattern of the decoration corresponds to the outline of the mountain surface. The center of the pattern is the highest point of the mountain. In the center, the pattern has the following arrangement. Notes on the decoration The mountain of the decoration is constructed like
