With Edit 'n' Go lets you capture your image edits directly to a link in the browser for convenient sharing—sending anywhere in the world from the comfort of your PC with a flash drive, memory card, or wireless broadband connection. If you have multiple digital art media types (like X-ray film, zip disk, or 16mm. I've never used the Lightroom 6-inch display) and want to shoot directly to one, Lightroom lets you import multiple images, capture all raw photo editing adjustments, and save your metered image at once into a single file. It even includes two options to quickly output your edited files to a single output destination. It's also easier than ever to import images from 35mm film (and or 15MP digital slides). If you don't have an X-linked slideshow, you can use the Export to Flash option to create a frame-by-frame animated presentation that can be sent to your friends or family. Sounds pretty easy, right? Unfortunately, Lightroom has difficulty determining the linear range of your film, so instead you're presented with a 25% gray default that overlays all your images. When you adjust the dynamic range slider in Lightroom, it only adjusts the particular image. Lightroom is packed with new features, some of which are easy to understand and use. For example, a new Search feature lets you execute a search for a particular type of image, location, shooting time, or anything else. Of course, Lightroom by default works with popular DSLR and mirrorless cameras like Nikon, Canon, Sony, Leica, Olympus, and Panasonic, as well as MANY more, including most photo-editing software. And with the new Export to Flash option, you can create a slideshow for your X-ray film, 35mm slides, or Digital 8, 16, and 36 millimeter film images. Better yet, you can export them as JPG, GIF, or PNG images to easily create slideshows for a wide variety of media.
