Companies the government, report or deduction this.Q: How to cache responses for a range of requests to a MySQL query? Given I have a MySQL query that returns a lot of data which I need to display in a datagrid (like 10,000 rows), how can I load the data into the datagrid in the same way without getting that same data again? Basically, how can I cache the data from that query for a short time so that the data is already available? A: There are several ways to accomplish that. If you use PHP MySql, then you can use the SELECT... INTO OUTFILE syntax to export the result to a text file. Read that file, parse out the data, and put it into a database table. Then, use that table as a cache for further requests. If you use ASP.NET MVC, you can use the OutputCacheAttribute to store the output of the controller action and fetch it during future requests. Regardless, it's important to load the data into a cache object to preserve it between requests. Then, you can simply query the cache before doing the query. 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a system and method for managing schedule requests, and in particular, to a system and method for enabling a user to request schedule changes based on the availability of resources within a pre-defined schedule that is configured by an administrator. 2. Description of the Related Art In the scheduling of tasks, a management solution (i.e., a system manager) is often faced with the difficult task of allocating and coordinating resources for the users of the solution. This task can be difficult when there are many tasks and resources, and a lot of flexibility is allowed. One solution that is currently used is to develop a task inventory, where a manager can identify all of the tasks that must be performed and what resources are required to perform the tasks. For each task, the manager determines if resources are available, and allocates the task to the closest available resource. As more tasks are added, they tend to be allocated to the closest available resources that are not already allocated to other tasks. This results in a schedule where the resources tend to be
